
Where ingredients dance with spices and sauces

Mainland China

The Great Wall of China extends for 3,000 miles from the Bohai sea to the Gobi desert, guarding a mysterious and immense empire centuries old. Beyond the Great Wall lies ancient China, blessed with sensitivity and a playful inventiveness. Of its innumerable legacies to the world outside, none stands out more than its colourful and stunning tradition of fine food.

Surely no cuisine on earth could match the diversity of Chinese cuisine. Within its range, there will be something to satisfy any palate. From the tongue-teasing spices of Sichuan province in the south, to the painstakingly ceremonial festival entrees of Beijing; from the subtle, and seductive combinations of Guangdong province (modern day Canton) to the robustly aggressive gravies of Hunan and the enigmatic and nearly magical spice mixtures of Fukien province.

The secret of good taste lies largely in the freshness of ingredients, and in their harmonious combination—a good Chinese chef knows this. A couple of well-chosen spices can do divine dance with crisp vegetables picked from the bough, cut artistically, and mixed with succulent cuts of meat. All depend on the cook's sense of timing and innovation.

Magic in the kitchen takes only minutes. Once the ingredients are matched, spicy with sweet, soft with crunchy, cold with hot, diffident with adventurous, they will be rapidly processed in sauces and spices to be reborn piping hot and fresh, ingredients still alive in colour, flavour and crunch. Excess marks the amateur; subtlety signals the master chef. Above all, no ingredient must yield to another. Each should stand out proud and glorious, in perfect competition with everything else.

This is the kingdom of Mainland China, beyond the Great Wall.
A place where all dreams come true.
